Chelsea Are A Big Price For The Top 3 But It's Win Only Betting - By Ian Hudson

We have a rare Premier League weekend programme because six of the fixtures kick-off at 3pm on Saturday. Personally that's a good thing as a football fan from the Division One era used to matches beginning at the same time. The staggered match times are at the behest of television but the broadcaster's money has paid for safer and more comfortable grounds and better pitches. As a supporter from a bygone age I will enjoy taking my seat at Old Trafford just before 3 o'clock on Saturday. The first live match which brings together Tottenham and Chelsea starts after the final whistle in the afternoon fixtures so we have the best of both worlds.

Chelsea are one of three unbeaten teams in the Premier League after 12 fixtures. Liverpool and Manchester City have also not lost a league fixture and that's the first time in the history of top flight football in England that three teams have got to this stage without suffering a defeat. It could be how the fixtures have panned out and a one-off or an indication of how the best teams are so much better than the rest. Liverpool and Manchester City have drawn at Anfield and Liverpool picked up a point at Chelsea. If the other four meetings of the superpowers are drawn it's not beyond the realms of possibility for three teams not to lose a league match this season.

The latest outright betting for the Premier League suggests Manchester City are home and hosed. The cunning bookmakers are now only allowing win only bets and the reasoning needs explaining. They offer place terms which are generally one fifth the odds for the first three places. Chelsea are 20/1 to win the Premier League but in reality less than 4/1 to finish in the top three. Shrewd traders could lay the win element of the bet and be left with a very generous place only bet that could be offset with a lay at a lower price on a betting exchange. In effect careful manipulation of the back and lay markets would create a win/no lose situation.

Tottenham are an enigma and it wouldn't be a huge shock if they ended Chelsea's unbeaten run at Wembley at tea-time on Saturday. Despite not making any significant signings in the summer and problems in moving into the new stadium they are just five points off the pace and have won four of their last five league fixtures. Real Madrid have appointed a new manager and Mauricio Pochettino is off their radar so he can continue the good work. Harry Kane will be buzzing after scoring the winner for England against Croatia and his Tottenham side can beat their London rivals.

Arsenal lost their first two Premier League fixtures and are now unbeaten in 10. Their last five matches have produced three draws and two wins but most of the crucial goals have been scored in the second half. They play at Bournemouth on Sunday and that side are riding high in sixth place. Arsenal's class and ability should prevail but not before the break. The logical bet is Draw/Arsenal in the HT/FT double result market. Bournemouth have won three of their six home league fixtures this season to date but a second defeat at home is on the cards against Arsenal.

The other two live TV matches involve teams in the bottom half of the table. Wolves have had a dip in results after a great start but a home win against Huddersfield should get their season back on track. Burnley have not picked up three points in five matches and look vulnerable to a visiting Newcastle side unbeaten in three fixtures in the Monday Night Football match. Its one of just four matches not starting at 3pm on Saturday so it's almost like the old days.

England Are Favourites To Win The First Nations League

The dust has now settled on the first UEFA Nations League and it turned out to be a good concept. The three team group format made for meaningful matches and there were promotion and relegation issues decided at the last minute. The competition has created matches with something to play for between the better nations and most countries took the tournament seriously. With 12 minutes to go against Croatia at Wembley last Sunday England were looking at relegation but scored two late goals to win the group and qualify for the finals. Holland, Portugal and Switzerland have also made the last four but ENGLAND are the favourites to win the Nations League at 2/1. Football could be coming home next summer.

It's a blank evening for any meaningful football matches in Europe but there is a full schedule of fixtures in the NFL to celebrate Thanksgiving Day in the United States. Fans of the sport played by over-padded lumps with more advert breaks than action can enjoy three live televised matches from 5.30pm through to the middle of tomorrow night. To coincide with the holiday there could be more than the average number of points. First up is Chicago at Detroit and OVER 46.5 POINTS can be backed at 13/10 with Ladbrokes.

England have won their first overseas Test series in two years in beating Sri Lanka so the third and final match in Colombo starting early tomorrow morning is a dead rubber. There is very little to choose between Sri Lanka's average score and the visitor's average score in their last 10 Test matches in Colombo. Five of the last Test matches at the venue have produced definite outcomes but the previous five ended in draws. Remarkably Sri Lanka have won the toss in nine of those matches. The wicket favours spin and with the series decided the value lies in backing SRI LANKA to beat England at 2/1 with William Hill.

The richest prize in today's racing in Britain is on offer in the Class 2 handicap at Newcastle (1.20) over one mile and four and a half furlongs on the All-Weather. The bottom weight and highest rated horse is VICTORIA DRUMMOND. The improving runner is up in grade and has a 6lb penalty but is still the selection to win this race and that outcome is 15/8 with Paddy Power.
